Introduction: The Status of Hazrat Khadijah (SA) in Islam

Hazrat Khadijah bint Khuwaylid (SA) is one of the greatest figures in Islamic history. She was the first believer in Islam, the most loyal wife of the Prophet Muhammad (PBUH), and an independent, successful woman who played a vital role in the early days of Islam.

Unfortunately, in South Asian societies, we often praise her but fail to apply her teachings in real life. Many people talk about her virtues, yet deny women the very rights she exercised—such as choosing a husband, running a business, and using wealth for noble causes. If we truly respect Hazrat Khadijah (SA), we must incorporate her character into our lives rather than limiting our admiration to speeches and discussions. We must break out of empty traditions that have confined us to mere words, and instead, enter the true field of action where our Imam of the time (AJTF) awaits us.

This booklet presents practical lessons from her life that challenge harmful customs and outdated mindsets in today's society.

Practical Lessons from Hazrat Khadijah's (SA) Life for Our Society

1. A Woman Can Initiate Marriage: Breaking Social Stigmas

One of the most powerful lessons from Hazrat Khadijah's (SA) life is that she herself proposed marriage to the Prophet Muhammad (PBUH) in a society that was deeply rooted in gender biases. She did not wait for society's approval—she saw his noble character and chose him as her life partner.

Lesson for Today:

In our culture, if a woman expresses her desire to marry a man of good character, she is immediately judged. Families often hesitate to send proposals, assuming it is the “man’s responsibility.” Some so-called religious families do not even allow their daughters to have a say in their marriage. However, Hazrat Khadijah (SA), the most respected woman of her time, proved that a woman has every right to make this decision. Parents should encourage their daughters to choose a husband based on faith and character rather than wealth or social status. This is only possible if we prioritize religious upbringing over societal expectations.

2. Women Can Pursue Education and Careers Within Islamic Boundaries

Hazrat Khadijah (SA) was a successful businesswoman at a time when women had little independence. She conducted business with honesty and was highly respected in Makkah. Today, many families in Pakistan and India still deny women the right to education or work, fearing "what society will say."

Lesson for Today:

Islam has never prohibited women from education or careers. If a woman follows Islamic principles and maintains dignity, she has the right to learn and work. Families must stop restricting daughters, sisters, and wives from using their abilities. Whether in medicine, teaching, business, or any other profession, women should be encouraged to contribute to society, just like Hazrat Khadijah (SA) did. In today's era, many of these opportunities are available from home, making it even more practical.

3. Marriage Should Be Based on Character, Not Wealth or Dowry

When Hazrat Khadijah (SA) chose Prophet Muhammad (PBUH) as her husband, she did not consider his financial status. He had no wealth, but he was the most honest and trustworthy man. She did not demand a high dowry or show off her status—their marriage was based on love and respect.

Lesson for Today:

In our culture, marriages have become financial transactions. Families demand extravagant dowries, grand wedding functions, and expensive gifts, forgetting that the best marriage in history—between Hazrat Khadijah (SA) and the Prophet (PBUH)—was simple. We must stop burdening girls' families with dowry demands and prioritize good character over money.

4. Supporting Husbands and Strengthening Families

Hazrat Khadijah (SA) stood by the Prophet (PBUH) when the whole world opposed him. She strengthened him when he felt sorrow. Her emotional and financial support was a strong backbone to continue spreading Islam.

Lesson for Today:

Today, marriages are breaking over minor disagreements. Spouses fail to support each other during difficult times. Women should take inspiration from Hazrat Khadijah (SA) and be a source of strength for their husbands, just as husbands should also appreciate and respect their wives. Mutual respect and trust create a strong marriage.

5. Women Have the Right to Own Property and Wealth

Hazrat Khadijah (SA) was the wealthiest woman in Makkah. She used her wealth wisely and helped the early Muslims without hesitation. Islam granted women the right to own and manage their property 1400 years ago, but even today, many women in Pakistan and India are denied their inheritance.

Lesson for Today:

Women must be given their rightful share in inheritance. No one—brothers, uncles, or husbands—has the right to take away what Allah has granted them. Families must stop treating daughters as outsiders and recognize their financial rights. Instead of following unjust cultural practices, we must align ourselves with Islamic teachings.

6. Prioritizing the Good of Society Over Materialism

Hazrat Khadijah (SA) could have lived a life of luxury, but she chose to spend her wealth for the cause of Islam. She did not collect gold or build palaces—she invested in the future of her community.

Lesson for Today:

Our society is obsessed with materialism. Expensive weddings, branded clothes, luxurious cars, and grand homes have become status symbols. We should learn from Hazrat Khadijah (SA) that true success is not in wealth but in using it for a greater purpose. Instead of wasting money on unnecessary luxuries, we should focus on education, helping the poor, and building a better society.

7. Women Must Be Respected and Valued in the Family

Hazrat Khadijah (SA) was deeply loved and respected by the Prophet (PBUH). Even after her passing, he never forgot her kindness. He spoke about her with love and honored her memory.

Lesson for Today:

In many households, women—especially mothers and wives—are not given the respect they deserve. Domestic violence, verbal abuse, and emotional neglect are common issues in South Asian families. Islam teaches us to honor women, just as the Prophet (PBUH) honored Hazrat Khadijah (SA). Every woman in our homes should feel valued and appreciated.

Turning Words into Action

Hazrat Khadijah (SA) was not just a historical figure—she was a role model for all times. But in our society, we have turned her life into just a story rather than a guide for real change. If we truly admire her, we must:

- Allow women to choose a husband based on faith and character.
- Encourage women's education and careers within Islamic values.
- Stop the dowry system and prioritize simple marriages.
- Strengthen marriages through mutual support and respect.

- Give women their rightful inheritance and financial independence.
- Reduce materialism and focus on helping others.
- Respect and honor women in our families.

It is time for our society to move beyond empty praise and start implementing Hazrat Khadijah's (SA) lessons in real life. Let us challenge outdated customs and create a society where women are valued, respected, and empowered—just as Islam intended.

May Allah give us the strength to follow in her footsteps and bring real change to our communities.
